

The Digital Public Space Research Network (DPSRN)

Seed Funding

DIGITALIZED!

Cultural Heritage

The project explores how the digitization of the public space obliges us to revise our notions of individual and collective agency. In particular, DPSRN responds to this question by bringing together early career researchers with expertise in different fields to: (1) develop a novel methodology for understanding the public space that incorporates non-linguistic media, particularly the role of the audiovisual and digital interfaces in the public space; (2) address the question of online agency and subjectivity through the key concepts of anonymity and publicity; (3) consider communities and collective action in the digital public space, particularly the forms of belonging and representation presented by marginalized groups and solidarity movements online.
